

Erin Brockovich is ~~a police officer and / an unemployed single~~ mother of three children who, after losing / winning a personal injury lawsuit against a doctor in a car accident she was in, asks her boy friend / lawyer, Edward L. Masry, if he can find her a job just for fun / in compensation for the loss. Ed gives her work as a cleaning woman / file clerk in his office, and she fakes / runs across some files on a pro bono case involving medical records in real-estate files and PG&E offering to purchase / clean up the home of Hinkley, California resident Donna Jensen.

Erin begins digging into the particulars of the case, convinced that the facts could ruin Ed's business / simply do not add up, and persuades Ed to forget all about the case / allow her further research.

After investigation, she discovers a systematic cover-up of the industrial producing / poisoning of the town of Hinkley's water supply that threatens / enhances the health of an entire community. She finds that PG&E is responsible for the lack of / extensive illnesses that the residents of Hinkley have been diagnosed with and forgets / fights to bring the company to justice.

Erin meets a mysterious man in a bar / an old friend at his home who claimed to Erin to have destroyed documents at PG&E, and discovers a 1966 document that ties a conversation of a corporate executive in the San Francisco PG&E headquarters to the American President / Hinkley station that knew the water was clean / contaminated but didn't do anything about it and advised to stop the production / keep it a secret from the Hinkley neighbourhood. The evidence was examined by a judge / the Salvation Army. PG&E was ordered to pay a settlement amount of $333 million that was just wasted money / divided among the 634 plaintiffs.
