

Hemingway was an American writer of novels and short stories. He had an adventurous life. He died in 1961.

Much of Ernest Hemingway's writing is based on his own adventurous life. He drove an ambulance in World War I and was a war correspondent in World War II and in the Spanish Civil War. He went hunting to Africa, was a deep-sea fisherman, and loved bullfighting. He was a hard drinker, a fighter, and was married four times.

His books reflect his life and interests. His first success was "A Farewell to Arms" in 1929. It was about his experiences in Italy in World War I. "Death in the Afternoon" came out in 1932. It was a study of bullfighting. "For Whom the Bell Tolls" tells of an episode of the Spanish Civil War. "The Old Man and the Sea" is about an old fisherman trying to catch a huge fish.

Hemingway's writing skills were rewarded with the Pulitzer Prize in 1953 and the Nobel Prize in 1954. Despite his success, Hemingway became depressed by his drinking problem and his failing health and shot himself in 1961.
